

Children are our future. And one by one a difference in the world can be made if each child is given the best possible chance to reach his or her full potential. Meet Carlos. He can already read, write, and do basic math. He is multilingual. He's a really bright kid. He smiles and laughs a lot. He loves playing and he loves life. And he is the sunshine in his mother's world.

We live in a society where day care is necessary as both parents work or only one is available. This is the case with Carlos. His mom is a divorced, working class woman. She's not "perfect" but she loves Carlos and does what she can by taking time to listen to him and help him with various school related work. She likes being involved in his care and knows her role is crucial in her child's development. She feels all parents share that responsibility. But when Carlos spends hours away while she works, she wants the daycare to be an extension of her own home and wants to afford him every chance to excel.

She believes all children deserve a clean, safe, healthy, and caring environment that delivers proper nutrition and fosters overall well-being. She knows that all daycare centers are state regulated and must comply with well-defined rules and safety procedures. However, she does not want to settle for minimum standards. She wants more. She knows other parents feel the same way about their children as she does about Carlos. She wants to know that there will be physical as well as mental activities and that each and every child is encouraged to do his or her best individually and in groups. She wants confidence knowing that the staff is capable and have all the skills and tools necessary for delivering exceptional care and education to all children. She knows she wants it all. And now, she's found it.

"She" is me. And Carlos is my son.
